- Gmnotes: Script: Welcome everyone by name if possible. Say: I'm Kyle, he/him, and you can call me Kyle. I've been running TTRPGs for 15+ years, both in person and online. For Daggerheart, my style is story-first and roleplay-friendly: the mechanics are here to support the table's fun and help us resolve risky moments, not to make you memorize a rulebook. I play the world, frame scenes, make rulings, and help everyone get time in the spotlight. You play one character and tell me what they try to do. Before we begin, let's confirm end time, breaks, bathrooms, drinks, phone expectations, and any Mox house policies. This card exists before safety and rules so strangers know what room they are in. Keep it practical. The table needs confidence, not a speech. Checklist: Introduce yourself as GM; Name/pronouns: Kyle, he/him; Mention 15+ years running in-person and online TTRPGs; State story-first, roleplay-friendly Daggerheart style; Confirm headcount, seats, names, and any latecomers; Confirm session length and target end time; Cover Mox house policies or ask staff if needed; Point out bathrooms, drinks, and table logistics; Set phone policy: reference and emergencies are fine, attention stays...

- Storytakeaway: This is a complete one-shot, not a campaign pitch or open-ended planning meeting.
- Mechanictakeaway: Establishes GM role vs. player role before any Daggerheart rules are introduced.
- Takeawayhelp: Players know who Kyle is Players know Kyle's name, pronouns, experience, and GM style. This cue gives Kyle credibility and lowers pressure for beginners: story-forward, mechanics-assisted, and open to interruption. "I am Kyle, he/him. I have run tabletop games for more than fifteen years, and tonight my job is to help the table tell a strong story without making rules feel like homework." If someone asks how strict the rules will be: "I care about the rules when they help the scene. If a rule would slow us down, I will make a clear ruling and keep us moving." This cue gives Kyle credibility and lowers pressure for beginners: story-forward, mechanics-assisted, and open to interruption. safety-tools table-spotlight The night is a complete one-shot This is a full one-shot with a beginning, middle, and end. Use this to prevent campaign-pitch drift. The table should feel that their choices matter tonight. "Tonight is built to complete a story at the table: onboarding, contract, road trouble, village pressure, reveal, and final choice." If a player asks whether this becomes a campaign: "Tonight stands alone. If people love it, there are future threads, but you will get a complete arc..."
